meeting Thursday. Kuhl wrote he was unable to meet with them and did not offer to reschedule a meeting, Mychalejko said.

Tate was among the five anti-war demonstrators arrested Aug. 7.

Mychalejko denied any connection with the group arrested two weeks ago.

"He has not returned our calls, he refuses to talk to us," Mychalejko said. "Now, since he has stated he is willing to talk to his constituents any time, that seems a little disingenuous."

Mychalejko and other protesters Thursday claimed they are local residents and not political operatives from other areas.

CRASH

The girls said they didn't know how far along the dark, winding road the SUV followed them. But Sayasith's car was traveling at more than 70 miles an hour when it left the 30-mph road at a bend, hurtled down a steep embankment and plowed into trees.

Sayasith was killed along with fellow Churchville-Chili High School junior Kaitlin Palmer, 17. Another passenger, Theodore Piendel, 16, died of his injuries eight days later.

The confrontation at around 10 p.m. on May 27 may have been triggered when another car drove down a nearby private driveway a short time earlier, friends of the victims said. The family at that residence had been irritated by pranksters ringing the doorbell and then running off before someone Protesters were told Thursday by village Police Chief David Rouse they could not assemble in front of Kuhl's district office or stage a rally because they had not applied for a parade permit.

Meghan Tisinger, director of communications for Kuhl, said the protesters should call the district office for an available appointment.

"They need to go through the same procedure as everyone else," Tisinger said.

Mychalejko said Kuhl should explain his support of the war to the voters.

"If he's willing to send the sons and daughters of the people here into a meat grinder, he should be willing to answer a few questions," Michalejko said.

Sayasith "didn't want any confrontation and that is why he didn't get out of the car. They wanted to get out of that situation," his aunt, Julie Pathamavong, said in Thursday's Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

"This wasn't a story of teenagers driving irresponsibly and speeding. They were being chased, and the people who were chasing them need to come forward and say something."

District Attorney Mike Green said the men who confronted the teens were interviewed but the case will not be forwarded to a grand jury because "there's not enough to show a cause-and-effect relationship."

Both the Monroe County prosecutor's office and the sheriff's department declined to say what led to the confrontation.

a sign honoring the state champions and place it inside the school building? That way, it will be visible to the people who are the most immediately affected.

Also, a big outdoor sign honoring the champions may be a wonderful thing now, but in a few years, it will mark events that most students at that time will never remember.

Fame, especially in sports, is extremely transitory. It's too bad the backers of this project haven't taken that thought into consideration as they formulated their proposal.

You can never predict what turns on the populace.

I wrote the other day about the "Smith & Jones" law firm that trolls for customers with TV ads.

I wondered, after months of ads for "the Smith Firm," where "Jones" had come from.

Several readers responded with the information that "Jones" had been a partner several years ago, but ran into some legal difficulties which forced him out of action for a time. Now he's square with the authorities again, and back in his corporate saddle.

I'm happy for "Jones" but still don't see why "Smith" felt compelled to simply put his partner's name back on the corporate logo with no explanation, after an extensive campaign that had simply heralded the successes of "the Smith Firm."

Anyway, seems that The Insider wasn't the only one to wonder about the whole business after prolonged exposure to the TV ads. And thanks, readers, for your responses.
